Roadmap for financing the next phase of growth

As India celebrated its 73rd Independence Day, the roadmap for the next phase of growth is of prime importance and much interest across the spectrum. While the details are being debated, the three focus areas of greater detail on the financing of new investments, efficient allocation of government funds and innovative steps around the privatisation of government assets deserve increased attention.

Greater clarity must emerge around the actual financing path of the large-scale investments that the government plans to undertake to boost investor sentiment. For instance, the 'Jal Guah Abhiyan' on the creation of water assets in India is a well-thought-out and vital idea. As various estimates will emerge regarding the total investment required, concurrently more significant details must start appearing about how exactly the multiple components such as access to piped water, river linking and water conservation projects of the much-needed and ambitious water projects will be achieved.

Financial details, as discussed above, are essential since not all projects will have financial viability without proper generated cashflow, and perhaps certain large projects will have significant economic value with no cashflow at all. Therefore, a clear roadmap that lays out the financing plan in terms of investments, revenue generation and sources of financing is vital. As more important details regarding the sources, utilisation and timelines emerge regarding the large-scale infrastructure projects, investor sentiment will get a significant boost. A gradual but deliberate delineation of the financing path will both provide related stakeholders with a good idea of the capital inflow and more importantly allow investors to trade securities for imminent opportunities.

As the clamor call for higher government spending, loans and rebates, picks up momentum to boost the economy, the efficiency in the financial management of government resources deserves more attention. Thus, the asset monetisation, greater tax compliance, and about the utilisation of government resources to achieve intended outcomes is as crucial as bringing the cost. As India looks to garner high investments, especially in a high-energy consuming economy, the utilisation of available funds is as important as identifying new sources of finances.

The bulk around asset monetisation and listing of assets has been in the news of late and is a topic of prime importance. Research now suggests that the government might consider listing Assets Authority of India (AAI). While this is the right thing to do to attract value and the needed capital, India also needs to look for hybrid and innovative methods by considering whether instead of AAI, the listing of individual airports or a pool of airports is possible. The aim must be to provide clarity and transparency around the listing process that listing individual airports, in a pool of such airports, might provide, in addition to regularising a process of listing suitable government assets to generate capital.

Perhaps the most critical aspect of the listing process besides the details of the assets being listed is the fund utilisation from the proceeds that accrue to the government. A transparent method of the utilisation of the proceeds from the listing process is needed. Another important point that needs to be kept in mind is that the proceeds being utilised for the listing must create a template that can be both used and improved upon to be applied to other sectors of the economy. As India looks to boost the economy, the country needs a roadmap that taps out the source, both the utilisation of capital. The positive multiplier effect on private investment, incomes and consumption that such a roadmap can provide is vital for the next phase of growth.
